1. Introduction I¹

In a year of crisis and self-examination, the History Department continued to teach courses open to its Honors students, its majors and students majoring in other disciplines. The numbers of students enrolled in these courses were virtually the same as in 1970-71 (640-646).

The two standing committees made up of faculty and student representatives continued the work begun in the previous year. The Curriculum Committee -- with Dr. John Hilliker as chairman -- presented the results of the previous year's study and advocated several policy changes as well as the introduction of new courses and the deletion and transfer of others. These suggestions were approved by the Department in October and subsequently by the Faculty of Arts and the Senate. Out of the Curriculum Committee's report -- as well as the statements of policy with reference to graduate studies developed in 1968 -- came the departmental presentation to the Academic Planning Committee panel in November. The Extension Committee, under the chairmanship of Dr. Peter Raffo, continued its attempts to provide a rational and sequential service to students enrolling in off campus and summer programs. Its efforts to persuade faculty to undertake specific courses in specific areas at specific times were invariably successful; its efforts to integrate departmental and university-wide planning fell short of their objective but it is hoped that 1973-74 plans -- already in the tentative stage -- may influence decisions during the next year.

All other committees in the Department were Ad Hoc ones. Among these should be noted the so-called Map and Slide Committee. Ms. Susan Smith, Dr. Lynn Martin and Mr. David Belrose catalogued departmental map and slide collections and investigated the pooling of audio-visual resources within the University. So successful was the enterprise that the Department at its April meeting created a third standing committee with the more formal title of Instructional Media Committee.

As the experience of the standing committees of 1971-72 has shown, the relationship between departmental and university planning is by no means clear. Nowhere was the divergence more striking than in the variation between departmental recommendations and the actions of the Promotion and Tenure Committees. The Department regrets these divergences in opinion but accepts judgments in those cases in which general and recognizable standards have been established and consistently applied throughout the University.

2. Graduate Studies

When the History Department presented its graduate program for appraisal in 1968, the program was approved, subject to certain conditions. For the first five years, post-Confederation Canadian history would be the only field in which M.A. theses would be undertaken, and the maximum number of students the program would accommodate was set at six. On the recommendation of the appraisers, the Department chose to divide its attention equally between full-time and part-time students.

During 1971-72 the graduate enrolment has included two students in the thesis-only category, one other part-time student, and three full-time students.
